activation of macrophages by immune complexes. Systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE) is associated with the production of anti-DNA antibodies that form immune complexes (IC) that are capable of activating antigen presenting cells (APC). In the present study, we demonstrate that normal macrophages can be activated by anti-DNA IC in the presence of normal serum. The mechanism of activation involved the surface expression of a number of co-stimulatory molecules and the production of cytokines. Normal monocytes expressed constitutively the adhesion molecules Mac-1, LFA-3, and ICAM-1 and were able to adhere to immobilized anti-DNA IC as well as to fixed IC-coated plates. However, macrophages that were treated with EDTA were no longer activated by IC. Although IC increased the expression of Mac-1 and ICAM-1 on normal monocytes
